

Satellites and Large-Scale Air-Sea Interactions

David Halpern
Earth and Space Sciences Division
Jet Propulsion laboratory
California Institute of Technology
Pasadena, CA 91109-8099, U.S.A.

ABSTRACT

Satellites, by their frequent coverage of the global ocean, have already reduced the uncertainties associated with global ocean measurements, especially for sea surface temperature, sea surface height, surface wind components, near-surface layer biomass, and near-surface current. Examples of large-scale air-sea interactions will be discussed.